

conference but expanded and rethought versions of them. Because of its multi-author, multi-subject, multi-disciplinary format it cannot, of course, contain any consistent exposition or overview of the subject. Experts in any particular aspect will probably already have met the information here and the word 'up-to-date' might fairly have replaced 'new' in the subtitle. The book's appeal, therefore, will be to those who are already concerned with the subject but wish to have its growing points all brought together. Anybody concerned to know where we are at in alcoholism can read it with confidence. The publishers have stuck a high price on it, and readers may rightly complain that a book as expensive as this should have its printed lines justified. I hope this will not prevent it from having the wide readership it deserves because of its breadth of coverage and the clarity of its content.

I pose one question. Will the Colleges of Physicians and Psychiatrists, whose Presidents proclaim the subject matter to be so important, be doing anything to foster the inclusion of its information and ideas in postgraduate training programmes and to garner the fruits in examinations over which they exert an influence? I doubt it. Well, it may happen in Regents Park where serk. sup. does not always pass unheeded, as the latest number of the Journal of the Royal College of Physicians bears witness.

Depression and Schizophrenia: A Contribution on their Chemical Pathologies. By H. M. VAN PRAAG. London: SP Medical & Scientific Books, 1977. Pp 274. £15.00.

The most widely supported hypotheses for affective disorder and schizophrenia implicate dysfunction of aminergic systems of one kind or another. Reduced activity in serotonergic or noradrenergic neurones is usually postulated for affective illness, whilst the transmethylation hypothesis, increased dopaminergic or reduced noradrenergic activities are usually proposed for schizophrenia. Of the two areas of inquiry, that into the affective disorders is the more developed from the points of view of the amount of information accumulated on the characteristics and accompaniments of these conditions, and on the properties of the various antidepressant drugs.

The point has now been reached where this corpus of knowledge has become increasingly difficult to reconcile with the initial amine hypothesis for affective disorders, and it is becoming clear that new ideas need to be formulated and tested. The present hypotheses for schizophrenia look equally attractive or unattractive, depending on your point of view.

At this interesting stage in the development of research into these two groups of illnesses, this volume is to be welcomed, and Professor van Praag is a distinguished and thoughtful investigator who has contributed to the knowledge of both.

Here he has summarized the main data on amines currently available and relevant to the functional psychoses, and he has tried to evaluate complex and often puzzling findings in this difficult area. The method of marshalling material has tended to keep each logical step to a brief chapter so that the reader is led relatively painlessly through the mass of information and can more easily follow the progression of the arguments. This book should be of use to a wide spectrum of readers.

Hashish. Studies of Long-Term Use. Edited by COSTAS STEFANIS, RIEKA DORNBERG, and MAX FINEK. New York: Raven Press, 1977. Pp 195. $15.00.

Some problems are by their nature resistant to scientific investigation. The epidemiology of illicit actions is one of these, and the experimental study of the effects of long-term illicit behaviour is little easier; but Dr Stefanis and his collaborators have come as close as possible to making a really valuable contribution to our knowledge of one such kind of behaviour—the long-term use of hashish. Because the methodological problems (chiefly the correct definition, discovery and persuasion of cases and controls to collaborate) are virtually insoluble, there is never likely to be general agreement about the result of any studies in this field, particularly when the results run against the judge's own prejudice. However, there have now been several studies in addition to this one in Greece (for example in Costa Rica, India and Egypt), and the major conclusions of the present authors regarding all of them are worth quoting from page 156: 'The studies fail to define an inherent toxicity to the nervous system, mental status, or medical complications for long-term cannabis use. Differences among the studies are seen largely in the incidence of psychopathologic abnormalities.' The chicken and egg controversy is not likely to be resolved by these, nor indeed by any studies that employ a retrospective method for case finding.
