

Edward I

THE KING AS WARRIOR

The Battle of Falkirk

Riding high on his success against the English forces at Stirling Bridge, the rebel Scots leader, William Wallace, continued his campaign for independence in Scotland. The crunch came at the Battle of Falkirk in 1298, when Wallace and his army suffered a crushing defeat that set back their cause for many years to come.

On 11 September 1297 the English army had suffered a decisive defeat at the hands of the Scots under the leadership of William Wallace at Stirling Bridge.

The fight for Scottish independence had taken a new and, for the English king, Edward I, dangerous turn. This Scottish upset did not just represent a physical threat, however; the English army was strong and well-trained and the defeat at Stirling Bridge had been a humiliation for Edward. He vowed his revenge.

Wallace Consolidates Victory

Since leaving bridge, Wallace had continued his march through Scotland, liberating English-held areas such as Berwick, where (at least) nobles had paid homage to Edward I only the previous year. Wallace also began to conduct raids on the South of England. Such was his success, and so great was the following he had gained from the people of Scotland, that in March 1298 he was named Guardian of the Realm. Meanwhile the current king, John Balliol, was in exile.

Edward Retaliates

This was the last straw for Edward I and he assembled an army in preparation for tracking Wallace and his rebels a lesson. The Earl of Surrey headed the first wave

As William Wallace's Scots support and confidence grew in Scotland, Edward I became determined to reassert power in England. Having suffered a humiliating defeat at Stirling Bridge, Edward was determined to destroy Wallace and the dream of Scottish independence once and for all.

of attacks on Scottish soil, marching with determination and dealing a brutal blow to all who stood in his way. The English began to regain some of the strongholds they had lost to Wallace the previous year. When the advance party engaged with the king and the rest of the army at Linlithgow, they made up a force of some 1,000 cavalry and numerous archers with their deadly longbows.

Wallace knew that the tide was turning in England's favor once again and prepared himself for a final stand against Edward and his forces. He assembled his army at Falkirk and lay in wait for the attack. It came on 22 July 1298.

Battle at Falkirk

Wallace's band of patriots were fearless, but they were outnumbered by the English to a significant extent. Wallace ordered his men into a formation called a schiltrion in squares, with the front line knocking so that when the English cavalry charged they would run straight into a wall of fatal spikes from the pikemen. At first this formation worked, but then, from a distance, the English longbowmen started making some work of the Scots before the cavalry engaged in the attack. The support Wallace had been promised from the Scots nobles on horseback, under the leadership of Sir John Comyn, never delivered; they turned tail and fled from the carnage. Wallace's cavalry had been limited to begin with and now it was nonexistent.

A Guardian of the Realm William Wallace might not be seen as better against the English at Falkirk in 1298. True patriot and determined, brave, however, was in search for the sheer strength of the English army, ultimately not for independence and not for love.

he could not hope to defeat the English without them and within a few hours the day belonged to Edward.

Wallace's End

Once he realized that defeat was imminent, Wallace made his escape from the field of battle, along with some of his forces. From there he fled to France, abandoning his role as Guardian of the Realm. Once abroad he began to drum up support for the Scottish cause amongst their old allies, the French. He was a tenacious man and felt that although the battle had been lost, the war was not yet over. Returning to Scotland he began to pick up the campaign once more, but was captured in 1305. He was taken to London, where he was tried on charges of treason and executed. Edward had won Scotland, but the struggle was to be brief. A new champion for Scottish independence was to surface the following year: Robert the Bruce.
