

growth or manufacture, together with all sorts of foreign goods.

England, and especially London, profits immensely by its trade with the American colonies. Not only New York, but likewise all the other English towns on the continent, import so many articles from England that all their money must go to Old England in payment.

The goods with which the colony of New York trades are not very numerous. They chiefly export the skins of animals, which are bought from the Indians, great quantities of boards, timber, and lumber from the area around the Hudson River, and lastly, wheat, flour, barley, oats, and other kinds of corn.

New York likewise exports some flesh [meat] and other provisions. Iron, however, may be had more plentifully, as it is found in several parts of this colony, and is of a considerable goodness.

No manufactures [factories] of note have as yet been established here. At present they get all manufactured goods, such as woolen and linen cloth, etc., from England, and especially from London.

The Hudson River is very convenient for the commerce of this city, as it is navigable for near 150 English miles up the country, and falls into the bay not far from the town, on its western side. During eight months of the year this river is full of boats of all sizes, either going to New York or returning from there, laden either with inland or foreign goods.

The country people come to market in New York twice a week, much in the same manner they do at Philadelphia.

The governor of the colony of New York resides here, and has a palace in the fort. An assembly of delegates from all the districts of the colony is held in the city of New York once or twice every year. Everything relating to the good of the colony is here debated. The governor calls the assembly, and dissolves it [ends its meeting] at his pleasure.

The King appoints the governor according to his royal pleasure, but the inhabitants of the colony make up [provide] the governor's salary. Therefore, a man entrusted with this office has greater or lesser revenues according as he knows how to gain the confidence of the inhabitants.

There are examples of governors in this and other colonies of North America who, by their disagreements with the inhabitants, have lost their whole salary, the King having no power to make them pay it.

If a governor had no other resource in these circumstances, he would be obliged either to resign his office, or to be content with an income too small for his dignity, or else to agree in everything with the wishes of the inhabitants.

Group Discussion:

- 1. What did Peter Kalm see that shows that farmers settled in the middle colonies were doing very well in 1748?*
- 2. What indication is there that religious tolerance was already fairly common in New York at the time Kalm made his visit?*
- 3. What are the main points Kalm makes about trade and commerce between the colonies and England?*
- 4. What are the main points Kalm makes about the system of colonial government in New York?*
