THE ELEMENTARY UNITS OF PROGRAMMING IN HANDWRITING

Hans-Lee Teulings
 Patricia A. Mullins
 George E. Stelmach

INTRODUCTION

The identification of a production unit in motor programming has been posited by Sternberg, Knoff, Monsell and Wright (1983) to be a stress-group in speech sequences and a single keystroke in typing sequences. The idea of the existence of a production unit is based on the systematic and consistent way in which reaction time (RT) and movement time (duration) in a simple-reaction time paradigm vary as a function of the number of units contained in a movement sequence. In their subprogram-retrieval model, both RT and average duration per unit increase approximately 7 msec. for each unit in the sequence. In speech and typing, the RT and element duration effects seem to provide evidence for the identity of the production units; the slope is not affected when the stress groups contain additional unstressed words or syllables.

Since speech and typing research has demonstrated some success in inferring production units, scientists have begun to search for the elementary units that may comprise the motor program for handwriting. Handwriting is a well-learned skill which is easily decomposed into smaller movement units so that it should be possible to identify its component parts. In the past seven years, several efforts have been made to separate these components along somewhat natural partitions such as letters, or constituent strokes of a letter.

Teulings, Thomassen, and Van Galen (1983) attempted to discover the identity of a unit in handwriting by investigating whether it was a letter or a stroke. In this experiment, subjects wrote pairs of cursive letters in choice reaction time, partially pre-coded reaction time, and simple reaction time conditions. The letter pairs contained either repetitions or alterations of
