

Economic Incentives for Environmental Protection

Economists argue that environmental assets, because they are free or underpriced, tend to be overused or abused, thereby resulting in environmental damage. Economic incentives seek to correct this situation by setting a price for environmental damage or creating ownership rights to environmental goods.

Some environmental resources—such as timber, fish and minerals—are bought and sold in the market. But their price usually does not reflect the true cost of obtaining them because it does not include the cost of the environmental damage that may ensue from their extraction and processing. Other environmental resources such as the atmosphere and waterways are public or social goods that are not individually owned, or bought and sold, and do not have a market price. Economists argue that there is a strong tendency for people to overexploit and degrade these common property resources.

When individuals or firms make decisions about production, consumption and investment, they generally do not consider the environmental or social consequences because they seldom have to pay the cost of those consequences. For example, a company that discharges its effluent into a river affects fishers and other users of the water downstream. Yet the costs suffered by downstream users are not charged to the company nor built into the price of the company's products. The market does not take account of these environmental costs and they do not appear in the company's account books. These 'spillover effects' of doing business have been called 'externalities' by economists, indicating that they are external to normal market transactions.

The presence of these externalities represent a failure of the market to protect the environment. Economists seek to address this market failure by adjusting prices so that the person buying the goods or services causing the external cost is obliged to pay for it. This can be done by means of a tax—for example, on coal mining to cover the medical expenses of those miners who are suffering from black lung disease. The additional costs may also provide an incentive to the coal industry to find ways to prevent miners from getting this disease.

There are other ways of internalising environmental costs without relying on the pricing mechanism. One example is to require a company to take its water downstream from its discharge point. Laws force the polluter to take notice of external costs by prescribing limits to what can be discharged or emitted. Legislation can also cause costs to be internalised if it forces companies to pay for cleaning up their wastes.

Economists argue that this could be done more effectively if people and firms were charged real prices for using the environment. Economic instruments aim to make these external costs part of the polluter's decision, by adding a charge or by in some way providing a monetary incentive for considering the environmental and social costs. This ensures that environmental considerations are incorporated into market decisions.

While legislation is aimed at directly changing the behaviour of polluters by outlawing or limiting certain practices, economic instruments aim to make environmentally damaging
