

Central Themes of Feminist Social Work

1. Social work has always had feminist undertones because it often deals with women who are experiencing less than ideal living conditions, often through being exploited by the system.
2. Social workers seek to empower women to change their lives at both the micro (individual) level and at the macro (community, national and global) level.
3. Social workers challenge unjust ways of thinking about and treating women, together with challenging inequality. Inequality reduces women's power to make choices, exercise freedom and live life with dignity.
4. There is no single way of being a feminist. Cultural, womanism, liberal, radical and socialist feminists share common principles:
 - Individual experience should be viewed against political, social, cultural and economic factors—the personal is political.
 - The process, not just the product, is important.
 - Empowerment and providing choice are central.
 - Dualisms (e.g., right/wrong, rational/emotional) should be de-emphasised—rather, value difference.
5. Social workers empowering people to recognise and address patriarchy in its many forms, thereby supporting social inclusion, social justice, human rights and improved quality of life for the disadvantaged.
6. Feminist social workers place the structures and processes affecting clients at the centre of social work practice. Personal problems are linked to macro issues and how they impact on women.
