

Forest Sector Simulation Models as Methodological Tools in Forest Policy Analysis

Birger Solberg

The usefulness of forest sector models in forest policy analysis is discussed, mainly based on experiences from Norway. Forest sector modelling is contrasted to two alternative approaches: (i) Intuitive, verbal analysis, and (ii) econometric models. It is concluded that forest sector models, properly developed in contact with the policy makers, should be of considerable value in forest policy analysis.

Key words: Forest policy analysis, forest sector models.

Introduction

Forest sector modelling and forest policy analysis are topics of high interest in today's research community. Several of the existing forest sector models have been built with the intention just to perform forest policy analysis. A vital question is how useful are such models as methodological tools in forest policy analyses. This paper aims at discussing this question.

The discussion is mainly based on experiences from Norway, where two forest sector models have been developed. The first, the so-called SOS-model developed by J. Randers, K. Kallgraf and L. Stenberg at the Resource Policy Group, Oslo, on initiative of and in cooperation with professor F. Jørgensen at the Department of Forest Economics, Agricultural University of Norway, was one of the first forest sector models in use in the world. This model was a simulation model based on the Dynamo EDP-language. The model is documented in Tank-Nielsen & Høsteland (1979). A more verbal description of the model and the results are presented in Randers (1977), Randers et al. (1978), Ran-ders & Høsteland (1979) and Høsteland (1979). It seems fair to say that this model has not been much applied in Norway. Its significance seems primarily to lie in the influence on later forest sector models based on simulation – like Seppälä et al. (1980) and Lönnstedt (1983).

The second forest sector model tried in Norway is the so-called IBRD-forest model, originally developed by H. Bergendorff and P. Glenshaw in the World Bank (IBRD) for analysing forest industry investments in South-East Asia (Bergendorff & Glenshaw 1980). This model was applied by FAO and then taken to Sweden and used there by professor Sten Nilsson (Nilsson 1980, 1981). In close cooperation with him the Swedish version of this model has been adapted for Norway. The model is a regionalized linear programming model having 15 regions in the Norwegian version. The objective function is to minimize production costs of the forestry (logging and wood transport) and forest industry, covering the domestic demand for forest industry products and having free import/export to given world market prices. This equals an objective function which max-
