Abstract

Too often as a design professionals and educators have seen excellent conceptual ideas suffer during the process of realization, in large part because the designer and engineers did not understand the visual principles of divine proportion and composition. One of the most important things in virtuous looking products is the harmonious proportions of the design and product architecture. As Leonardo Da Vinci did with the human body, and his Vitruvian Man, a great number of studious men have done the same thing with the right proportions of the products. Talking about product design and its characteristics, the harmony of lines and volumes must pass unnoticed. One of the good visual design elements is proportion thus the reference for proportion study is by using golden ratio invented by Fibonacci which naturally the formula has been found in most perceived beautiful nature creations. When talking about the proportion of Aesthetics, golden proportion must be the key theory people may come up with. It first used in the early of the 20th century by Mark Barr with the Greek letter ϕ (pronounce "phi") to present the ratio. This golden ratio is also generally called the "golden proportion", "divine proportion", "golden mean" and so on. The equation can be expressed as $1.618 = \text{height} / \text{width} = \phi$. The aim of this study is to apply the phi matrix to assess the Virtuous Proportion of Aesthetics in Car Dashboard Design in order to assist which of design proposed meet the intended criteria of good design. This study is important as it will contribute to the body of knowledge in design methodology in search for product communicative language in form giving during designing process. It will also revive the approach of golden section in design area.
