Regularities in the Augmentation of Fractional Factorial Designs Lisa Kessel, 2013 Two level factorial experiments are widely used in experimental design because they are simple to construct and interpret while also being efficient However full factorial designs for many factors can quickly become inefficient time consuming or expensive and therefore fractional factorial designs are sometimes preferable since they provide information on effects of interest and can be performed in fewer experimental runs The disadvantage of using these designs is that when using fewer experimental runs information about effects of interest is sometimes lost Although there are methods for selecting fractional designs so that the number of runs is minimized while the amount of information provided is maximized sometimes the design must be augmented with a follow up experiment to resolve ambiguities Using a fractional factorial design augmented with an optimal follow up design allows for many factors to be studied using only a small number of additional experimental runs compared to the full factorial design without a loss in the amount of information that can be gained about the effects of interest This thesis looks at discovering regularities in the number of follow up runs that are needed to estimate all aliased effects in the model of interest for 4 5 6 and 7 factor resolution III and IV fractional factorial experiments From this research it was determined that for all of the resolution IV designs four or fewer typically three augmented runs would estimate all of the aliased effects in the model of interest In comparison all of the resolution III designs required seven or eight follow up runs to estimate all of the aliased effects of interest It was determined that D optimal follow up experiments were significantly better with respect to run size economy versus fold over and semi foldover designs for i resolution IV designs and ii designs with larger run sizes
