an English as a Second Language Co-teaching Model Carmen Shahadi Rowe,2015 The purpose of this study was to investigate how a co teaching model is implemented in a regular classroom with ESL students The factors that promote successful implementation and the perceived benefits of a co teaching model were also explored Participants included 42 co teachers and 9 principals from 13 elementary schools within an urban school district in southeastern Pennsylvania Data were collected from surveys open ended questions and interviews Findings from this study revealed a disparity among co teachers and principals with respect to co teaching models most frequently implemented Participants reported a need for more common planning time as well as excellent ongoing staff development regarding co teaching best practices and expectations Open and honest communication between co teachers and administrators was also cited as a need Additionally although teachers and principals reported that shared responsibility among co teachers is essential for successful co teaching data revealed a discrepancy in practice Based on the perceptions of teachers and principals co teaching was found to be socially beneficial for all ELLS and academically beneficial for most with the exception of those at the Entering level Finally co teaching was reported to be of additional benefit in that it provides teachers an opportunity to share their expertise and unique perspectives with one another and their students Overall co teaching when properly implemented was found to be an
