

The modernization of political institutions

In recent years several constitutional developments have helped modernise UK political institutions.

House of Lords Act 1999: removed from the Lords all but 92 hereditary peers and allowed for the introduction of more nominated life peers, including so-called 'people's peers'. It did not, however, allow for elected members of the Lords.

Constitutional Reform Act 2005: created a separate Supreme Court, which became the highest court in the land. It replaced the Law Lords, who, as their name implies, sat in the Lords. It therefore generated a greater sense of judicial independence and separation of powers.

House of Lords Reform Bill 2012: proposed that a reformed Lords should comprise 80% elected members and just 20% nominated, removing hereditary peers completely. The Bill was abandoned after 91 Conservative backbenchers voted against it.

Succession to the Crown Act 2013: enabled the eldest child of the monarch to ascend to the throne irrespective of gender, although it only applied to royal offspring born after October 2011. It also allowed an heir who married a Roman Catholic to retain their right of succession to the throne.

House of Lords Reform Act 2014: gave existing peers the right to resign or retire from their seats in the Lords, as well as enabling the removal of peers convicted of serious criminal offences or non-attendance. By early 2020, six peers had been removed for non-attendance, including the businessperson Baron Wolfson in 2017, and 106 had retired, including Lord Lloyd Webber, who also left in 2017, and former Liberal Democrat leader Lord Steel, who left in early 2020.

Greater Democracy

Referendums (Scotland and Wales) Act 1997: allowed referendums to be held in Scotland and Wales over the creation of devolved assemblies. 'Yes' votes in both countries, although by a very slim margin in Wales, meant that devolution could now take place.

Greater London Authority Act 1999: allowed for the setting up of a directly elected mayor for London. The Local Government Act 2000 contained provisions for elected mayors in other cities following local referendums.

European Parliamentary Elections Act 1999: changed the electoral system for European Parliament elections in England, Wales and Scotland from first past-the-post to a form of proportional representation- the regional closed list system.
