

Men, Masculinities and Feminism

R.W. Connell

Introduction

In the 1990s, and especially since the Howard government was elected, it seems that social justice ideas are in full retreat. Aboriginal land rights are under bitter attack, public university education is being undermined, the Disadvantaged Schools Program is no more, right-wing intellectuals mount endless assaults on "political correctness", and public racism is spreading.

In such an environment, we must expect the backlash against feminism to be renewed. Men are the "disposable sex", we are now told by "men's rights" advocates. Boys are the disadvantaged group in schools. Feminist elites have foisted unpopular and unneeded affirmative action programs on the long-suffering people, and we can now get rid of them. Men can rediscover their true masculinity. The "new lads" are coming out of the woodwork in Britain. Jeff Kennett is mobilising the petrolheads in Victoria, the Promise Keepers are on the march in America. Feminism is out, testosterone is in, right?

Wrong. It is true that backlash politics have become more powerful. But the backlash is not the only show in town. A great many men, especially young men, now accept principles of gender equality. Some are active in support of women's advancement, or against male-violence - such as Men Against Sexual Assault in Australia. Other men, while not campaigning on gender issues, are in alliance with feminism in other ways - supporting anti-discrimination laws, for instance, or equal pay campaigns in the workplace. There is a broad spectrum of men's gender politics, not just the one kind.

Men who do undertake action in support of feminism are not in for an easy ride. They are likely to be met with antagonism and derision from other men, picturing them as eunuchs, queens or sell-outs to "political correctness." They will not necessarily get warm support from feminists - some of whom are deeply suspicious of all men, most of whom are wary of men's power, and all of whom make a primary commitment to solidarity with women.

Taking on feminist principles means reconstructing personal relations as well as public life. This offers endless opportunities for hurt, mistaken judgments, and mistrust. Indeed, it is often easier to acknowledge women's rights to fair and equal treatment in the public world than to confront sexism at the personal level. This is the response of some powerful men in the professions, in bureaucracies, in universities and in politics. Labor governments in Australia, both at federal and state level, provide clear examples. Such men may find it easy to support equal opportunity and anti-discrimination programs, which correspond with their own agendas for efficiency and modernity. They are less likely to change the power structures of their own personal relationships.

What Are Men Afraid Of?

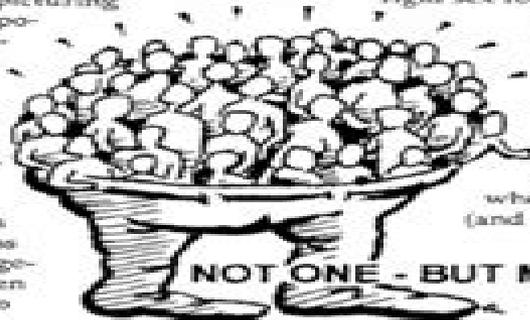

In 1989, a man massacred fourteen female students at the University of Montreal, in the process making abundantly clear that a hatred of "feminists" was his reason for shooting the women. He was, certainly, mad; but his madness was not random. It drew on a widespread sense of dislocation in gender relations, on a narrower but vehement ideology of men's supremacy, and on a festering fear of women's gains.

Feminist elites have foisted unpopular and unneeded affirmative action programs on the long-suffering people, and we can now get rid of them. Men can rediscover their true masculinity.

Why this fear? What are men afraid they will lose? In the early 1970s, it was argued that men had a lot to gain from women's liberation, which could lead to men being freed from their rigid sex roles too.

The problem is that rigidities of "sex roles" are far from the whole story. Men's dominant position in society has an economic pay-off. The statistics usually show women's incomes as a percentage of men's, but think of it the other way around - in terms of the dividend for men from current social arrangements. Men's average income in Australia is approximately twice women's average income, when all men and women are taken into account (and not just those in fulltime work).

Of course, men do not do twice as much work as women. "Time budget" studies in modern economies suggest that men and women work about the same number of hours. But most of women's work hours are unpaid - housework, volunteer work, "caring" for children, family and friends. And much of this labour is work done for men: work that keeps men well-fed and properly clothed, their living spaces clean and functional, their social networks in good repair. On top of this labour comes the
