

Human Behavior and Environmental Sustainability: Problems, Driving Forces, and Research Topics

Charles Wicks¹ and Linda Steg²

¹University of Twente

Social and behavioral research is critical for securing environmental systems, solving and preventing human living environmental problems. In just the following articles from broader perspectives, we first give an overview of worldwide developments in environmental quality and trends in research on. Second, five general driving forces of global environmental change are distinguished: population, affluence, technology, institutions, and culture; these are considered in terms of societal transitions in the evolution of human systems. Third, research in a few major research approaches to consumer resource differences, and institutional structures like these's specific impact for research and policy support concerning environmental and sustainability of different social levels. Fourth, the necessity of multidisciplinary collaboration and integrative developments in environmental psychology are discussed.

Environmental sustainability is a key issue that humans experience throughout the 21st century's world. All countries need to secure sufficient quality—in the short and the long term—of natural resources, ecosystems, and the diversity of plant and animal species, including the human living environment. Since 1987, the term “sustainable development” has been used to denote economic, social, and environmental dimensions of our future survival (WCED, 1987; see Robinson, 2004, for a conceptual review). In this issue, we focus on environmental sustainability and its relevance to human quality of life. Our focus is on positive and negative qualities of human living environments including nature for people, on what they “do” to people, what people “do” to them, and how this could be changed for the common good.
