

readers persevere through to this chapter – it is a valuable contribution to thinking on how evaluation is developing in the context of ‘performance management’ in decentralized/devolved management regimes.

This Handbook is a significant contribution to the literature on both evaluation and labour market policy. It makes important contributions to the debates on evaluation methodology, on the effectiveness of active labour market policies and measures and on the significance of institutional frameworks for policy effectiveness. It provides overviews of, and references to, a wide range of literature in these fields. It has, indeed, already become an essential resource for practitioners, evaluators and researchers in the labour market field. It can also be recommended to those with an interest and involvement in evaluation in other fields of public policy, who will find much ‘food for thought’, especially in the material in Parts One and Four.

This relatively small report (97 pages) is dedicated to the question of what the results are of the activities of the Canadian Federal Government in 1997. It provides an overview of results-based management, performance and accountability issues. It is linked with the federal government strategy to improve accountability to Parliament and Canadian society. That strategy has three steps:

- Improve results measurement and the use of findings to improve programs and policies;
- Strengthen performance reporting on results achieved. Diffusion of information through the Internet is referred to as is the goal of making reports available to the public with minimal formality (p. 10).

The report starts by stating that ‘performance consists of delivering results while respecting values’. It focuses on a model that underlies the activities reported, i.e. the results accountability model. This model includes two central ideas – results and accountability.

Results are defined as the ‘real impact of government activities on society.
