Abstract

Fish spawning phenology is a major concern for conservation and fisheries management. New intensive data sources, such as GPS-based tracking data and high-resolution catch declaration data, are becoming increasingly available in the field of marine ecology. These data benefit from high spatiotemporal resolution and open new research avenues for investigating the interannual variability in fish phenology. In this paper, we demonstrate how an integrated species distribution model informed by commercial catch data combined with spatiotemporal dimension reduction methods known as empirical orthogonal functions (EOFs) can be used to synthesize spatiotemporal signals in fish reproduction phenology. Specifically, we address the following questions: (1) Can we identify seasonal spatial patterns that can be interpreted in terms of reproductive phenology and essential habitats? (2) Can we identify changes in reproductive phenology over time? (3) Are these changes related to environmental drivers? The analysis illustrates the reproductive phenology of three key commercial species in the Bay of Biscay (sole, hake, and sea bass). The EOF analysis emphasized strong seasonal spatiotemporal patterns that correspond to reproduction patterns and feeding patterns. Based on this methodology, we identified seasonal variations in the timing of reproduction, and we related these variations to sea surface temperature, a key driver of fish reproduction.

Introduction

To complete their life cycle, fish require different habitats specific to different life stages (Harden 1969). These habitats, also known as essential fish habitats are associated with key demographic processes in the fish life cycle, such as spawning, feeding, and migration, and are characterized by a strong concentration of individuals within a spatially restricted area (Delage and Le Pape 2016). Fish may have to adapt to rapid environmental changes by physically adapting or by modifying their spatiotemporal behavior (spatial displacement or change in the seasonal timing of their demographic processes) to stay within the ideal habitat conditions.

Understanding changes in the phenology of demographic processes is critical for the management of fish populations. Knowledge of seasonal habitat use, the timing of migrations and the location of spawning areas is key for preserving fish habitats and ensuring the renewal of marine resources (Lieth 2013, Delage and Le Pape 2016). Reproduction is a critical stage of the life cycle, and knowledge of the areas where fish spawns and the timing of spawning require specific attention in terms of spatial planning and fisheries management (Grüss et al. 2019, Biggs et al. 2021).

Most of the available information available for investigating fish spatiotemporal demographic processes such as reproduction comes from data with only sparse spatiotemporal coverage (e.g. scientific survey data, capture-mark-recapture tagging data). Typically, such tagging methods involve capturing individuals from a population, marking them in a non-invasive manner, releasing them back into the environment, and then recapturing a sample of individuals (Jolly 1965, Seber 1965). These methods can be very efficient at inferring the movement of fish (de Pontual et al. 2023, Randon et al. 2021). However, the methods can be costly, and few data can be recorded. Typically, scientific surveys usually occur once a year and provide samples only on the time span of the survey, which does not necessarily depend on the timing of reproduction (Alglave et al. 2023). Onboard observer data provide additional data for the whole year by recording fishing catches on a small portion of commercial fleets (Rufener et al. 2021). With these data, it is possible to infer fish distributions seasonally or quarterly (Kai et al. 2017, Olmos et al. 2023). However, this temporal resolution is generally not sufficient to precisely investigate the phenology of demographic processes such as reproduction that occur at
