

in a "total gutting and rebuilding of Lazard Frères" (p. 41). All the former partners were terminated, the firm's Philadelphia, Boston, and Chicago branches were closed, and the New York office was kept small and staffed with individuals who shared their chief's views and ambition. Meyer expected Lazard to be more than a financial intermediary. He wanted the firm and the partners to participate as principals in the deals they engineered—not only as passive investors but, if necessary, as active managers as well. The large profits that Meyer sought so avidly did not come from underwriting fees and commissions; the big money was in turning small companies into larger ones. That was the business he cultivated, the one that brought him and the firm fame, power, and profits.

The way Meyer molded and used Lazard to accomplish his objective occupies most of Cary Reich's attention. His analysis of the shrewd banker's many profitable real estate and corporate deals is balanced and well informed. The same is true of his review of the firm's work in corporate mergers, some of the more notable being the many acquisitions it negotiated for the International Telephone & Telegraph Company. Though much of this biography rests on oral interviews, the author also has made excellent use of published primary sources and secondary works. Students of American business and finance will find Financier a useful addition to the literature of their subject, and the general reader will enjoy the details of Meyer's ties with the rich and powerful.

Vincent P. Carosso is William R. Kenan Professor of History at New York University. He is the author of several books and articles in American financial history, including Investment Banking in America (1970) and More Than a Century of Investment Banking: The Kidder, Peabody & Co. Story (1979). At present, he is working on a two-volume history of the Morgan partnerships.

Business history as a separate field does not exist in Canada. There is no publication equivalent to this review. The first conference devoted exclusively to the history of Canadian business was held this past summer at Trent University. That does not mean, however, that business has been ignored in Canadian historiography. Quite the contrary. As Glenn Porter showed in these pages more than a decade ago ["Recent Trends in Canadian Business and Economic History," Business History Review (summer 1973)], business has always been a central concern in Canadian historiography; it has just been viewed through a different optic.

Business-state relations, or political economy as it is known locally, has formed a major part of the mainstream since the staple historians of the 1930s laid down an interpretive framework that emphasized material forces in the shaping of the national experience. This tradition continues to flourish and has recently acquired a dialectical dynamic. The University of Toronto Press maintains a lively State and Economic Life series in which Tom Traves's own book appeared. In the trade market books about business, especially business failures, sell. One of the country's ablest historians is hard at work on a popular
