

The Incan family

Everyday life in Incan society took place within a type of community called ayllu. The organization of everyday duties was collective and aimed at, on the one hand the mutual collaboration among the relatives, and, on the other hand, to cover the State's demands. The creation of a new family nucleus was the way to reach adulthood and achieve full recognition within the community. If the "servitors" was passed, a previous wedding rehearsal to establish the compatibility between the spouses, a definitive and unbreakable marriage was consecrated. The members of the ayllu all helped to build the new home and provided the necessary tools.

Communal life

The ayllu was a peasant community that established in a territory and that was linked by family relationships with common ancestors. Incan society was governed by two main principles: reciprocity and redistribution. Reciprocity included the most of common status long. The redistribution of food and resources needed by the community was the State's responsibility. Through its highest authority, the Inca. The State provided each community with lands for their survival. Each year a local government employee assigned lots to each family according to the number of their members. The peasants were not the owners of the lands and the lots were farmed collectively by all the members of the community.

The main square

Creating a new home

When the couple married, the community, besides offering the needed financial goods, helped in the building of the new house. The State also provided the support (supplying a plot of land) for the maintenance of the recently married couple. Their land would be split into two with children and each one they had a child.

1. Mutual assistance
