

can come at the expense of quality, stability and cost. The faculty's experience (over nearly ten years) of an existing facility indicated more permanency than change.

On the question of flexibility, it seems that everyone has strong (but often divergent) views about what is necessary. In my visits to other comparable laboratories, I came across one whose staff were adamant about the need for flexibility in design. I found that virtually every laboratory was uniquely arranged and that change was common whenever faculty changed. Upon closer questioning, I became convinced that the different arrangements were more a result of individual preferences than of science. Because the flexibility was offered, each new faculty member felt they had to create a unique arrangement. Given choice, the ability to choose becomes important. On the other hand, many laboratories have very similar four-person modules with side and center benches that researcher after researcher has accepted unquestioningly because they were there and because they were functional. Similarity is also a testament to the fact that permanency is more likely than change.

For the Whitehead Institute, case-work quality and stability were valued more than the ability to rearrange case-work using only in-house staff. The plan did, however, ensure that the structural design and the layout of pipe runs were such that any single laboratory space could be gutted or even combined with adjacent laboratory space, without disrupting research in abutting spaces, particularly those above and below.

Conclusion

Although many details of the design were refined as the design progressed, there was never a wholesale revision in the layout. I conclude this was largely a result of the timely resolution of fundamental organizational and design issues. The architect's design can only match the user's needs if the user makes them known through the planners.

In the next issue of TIBS, the architect describes how the planning program was realized.

Cryo-electron microscopy of vitrified biological specimens

J. Dubochet, M. Adrian, J. Lepault and A. W. McDowell

Rapid freezing has long promised the most faithful structural presentation of biological material for electron microscopy. With the recent emergence of methods for vitrifying specimens, this promise seems about to be fulfilled.

Electron microscopy has profoundly influenced our image of living matter in the 50 years since its invention, but unfortunately, the most abundant constituent of living things, water, has invariably been excluded from these studies.

Electron microscopes must operate under high vacuum, and water evaporates at such low pressure. The construction of humid environmental chambers to preserve water in the specimen proved difficult¹. The idea of preventing evaporation by cooling the specimen² was more successful³, but this approach suffered from a major limitation: water crystallizes on freezing, inducing severe structural damage.

The recent discovery that liquid water can be cooled into a vitreous ('glass-like') solid, without crystallization, came
