Abstract

In the past decades, the West African sub-region has experienced turbulent political atmospheres. This is occasioned by persistent military interventions, and outright rejection of election results leading to violence, war and other forms of deprivations. This instability has been attributed to the traditionalistic and

Introduction

All over the world, the orientation and the perception of citizens towards political activities is an important factor in its social development and good governance. Citizens from a well-developed political culture tend to demand accountability from their leaders. This political culture reflects the peoples' history, the way the people think about politics and the society as a whole.

Political culture refers to people's predominant beliefs, attitudes, values and expectations about their country's political system, and the role of the self in that individualistic political cultures among the elites. However, in recent times, there appear to be a new wave of attitude towards response to election results that is blowing across the sub-region especially among its political leaders. Relying on secondary sources of data, and Self – Awareness Theory as a framework for analysis, this paper compared the 2015 Nigerian presidential elections and the 2016 Ghanaian presidential elections. The paper found that the reactions of the Nigerian and Ghanaian sitting presidents towards their countries' presidential election results saved both countries from needless wars. The paper therefore concludes that these exemplary feats have forced a shift in the elites' political norms and behaviours from traditionalistic and individualistic to moralistic political culture and has consequently guaranteed relative peace and stability in the subcontinent.

system. The appreciation of the prevailing political culture of a particular nation will enable one to properly understand the rules of the political game of
