--boundarybcnewids <integer> [<integer>]
Sometimes the geometry does not include all the necessary boundary conditions. Then this inline parameter may be used to define a new boundary (first parameter) on the interval of two already existing boundaries. This makes it possible to define lines or even single points in 3D geometry that has only surfaces defined.

--bcsplit [<integer>]
Sometimes there is a multitude of bodies that may be untied with this option. It may be easier to perform the further analysis if the number of bodies is not too large. For example, in ElmerPost a very lengthy list of bodies or boundaries is difficult to visualize.

--boundary2d <integer>
This option does exactly the same as the above but now for the boundary elements. Again the advantage may be that the command-file will be more economical as if the number of boundaries is reduced.

--2dlayer <integer> [<integer>] [<real>]
This option may be used to create boundary layers on an existing 2D mesh. The given boundary is extended with the given number of layers. Also the total thickness of the layer and the desired ratio between first and last element is given.

--2dlayercheck [<int>]
This option activates a filter that is used to map the node coordinates so that the boundary layers are fitted within the original geometry.

--dg2dlayer <int> [<int>] [<real>]
This option may be used to create boundary layers on an existing 2D mesh. The layer is created by splitting the triangles or quadrilaterals along that boundary to give a structured boundary layer mesh.

--3d -f ... -2d -f ... -1d
This option is usually not needed as the files more often have the information of the space dimensions. The exception is the creation of an example file. 3D is the default, thus the -2d should be used if one wants to create a 2D example file. Also some command-line parameter lists are by default assumed to have three values if 2D dimension is not given.

--linecurvature
In creating mapped meshes by ElmerGrid the higher-order nodes may sometimes be oddly displaced. This utility sets the intermediate nodes to lie on the connecting lines between the corner nodes.

--nobulksearch
Disable the saving of boundary elements. This may sometimes be useful if there are a lot of boundaries and one is just interested in the bulk elements.

There are a number of in-line parameters that are related only to the parallel Elmer computations.

--partdual [<int>] [<int>] [<int>] [<int>] [<int>]
There are two methods to partition geometry for parallel computing. This method takes each coordinate direction and divides the mesh to the number of slices given in the parameter list. For example option `--partdual 2 3 5` would split the mesh into $2 \times 3 \times 5 = 30$ partitions. Each split is done so that the number of elements in each partition is almost equal. The method is best suited for simple geometries where more generic strategies usually do not work as well.

The last flag is an optional flag which defines whether the geometric division is done primarily for the nodes or the elements. For value 0 the partitions is first done for elements and thereafter for nodes, while for value 1 the order is opposite.

--partkway [<int>] [<real>] [<int>]
The simple partitioning is done by dividing the elements into subgroups. The division is done by first ordering the nodes. This keyword is followed by the wanted vector of the desired ordering.
