Abstract: Emergency diagnostic testing is challenging in pregnancy, whereby some parameters may be modified by the pregnancy and, on the other hand, other laboratory tests are essential for monitoring pregnancy and for diagnosing its potential complications. Owing to a number of physiological adaptations which develop throughout physiological pregnancy, clinically significant changes may develop in the reference ranges of some laboratory tests such blood cell count, urea, creatinine, thyroid hormones, screening hemostasis tests and D-dimer. Reliable evidence is then accumulating that some specific tests may be very useful for diagnosing or ruling out pregnancy-related disorders, especially preeclampsia and even pregnancy-induced hypertension. Therefore, this article aims to provide a concise overview on the significance of emergency diagnostic testing in pregnancy.

Introduction

Owing to a number of physiological adaptations developing throughout normal pregnancy, several changes in reference ranges of laboratory tests tend to occur, as recently emphasized in some seminal articles (1,2). This evidence assumes pivotal significance for clinicians, especially for those who are not expert or specialized in pregnancy-related problems, but may be still challenged by their management. Among many of these healthcare professionals, emergency physicians (EPs) are particularly vulnerable to misinterpreting the results of laboratory testing in pregnant women presenting to the emergency department (ED) for a variety of symptoms, which can be either related or non-related to pregnancy itself. The most frequently used urgent laboratory tests, whose values are often modified during pregnancy, are summarized in Table 1 (1,2).

Notably, cardiac biomarkers are also frequently used in the ED, but no important variations in their reference values have been described so far to the best of our knowledge.

Cardiac troponins (cTns) are not essentially affected by pregnancy when measured with the former “contemporary-sensitive” immunoassays (8). An interesting study has recently been published using the novel high-sensitivity (hs) immunoassays. Briefly, Ravichandran et al. recruited a total number of 880 women, 14%, 24%, 47% and 10% of whom were in the first, second, third trimester and postnatal period, respectively (3). Overall, hs-cTnI concentration was measurable in the vast majority of these women, values exceeding the conventional 99th percentile of that specific immunoassay in only 2% of cases. Interestingly, patients who developed preeclampsia and even pregnancy-induced hypertension were found to have increased hs-cTnI values, thus confirming that cTns may be a valuable marker for predicting these pregnancy-related complications. This conclusion is supported by data obtained in another small-series case study involving 60 pregnant women published in form of an abstract by Ayachi et al., who also showed that the values of hs-cTnI were higher in women with preeclampsia than in those without (9).
