

Doubled Haploids

Gaining speed and greater genetic purity when developing inbreds

1 Like all plants, corn is comprised of both male and female chromosomes. On a corn plant, the male chromosomes reside in the tassel — female chromosomes reside in the ear and silks. When creating doubled haploids, breeders develop a unique “male” plant that creates haploid kernels to be crossed with a designated “female” plant containing desired traits.

3 Young haploid kernels are germinated and the seedlings are then treated with a compound that doubles their genetic material, making them genetically pure plants — meaning they contain only genes from their female parent.

2 The corn produces ears containing a mix of regular and haploid kernels. Ears are harvested by hand and haploid kernels are selected based on appearance. Kernels containing only genetic material from the female parent are haploid.

4 The seedlings are then transferred to outdoor nurseries for further research and development.

Definitions

- Chromosome: Any string of genes that carry hereditary information.
- Haploid: A cell containing one set of chromosomes.
- Homologous: Having identical genes or traits.
- Hybrid: The product of a cross between genetically unlike parents.
- Inbred: A homozygous line.

5 From this field, researchers select the best possible plants to be an elite parent for a Pioneer commercial hybrid.
