

Environmental Engineering - Pollution Prevention

It therefore draws from all other engineering disciplines that are apt to bear on the desired objectives. Pursuit of pollution prevention and sustainability further implicate social, cultural and economic considerations. Generally, it includes supply of water, disposal and recycling of wastes, drainage of communities, control of water, soil, atmospheric pollution and environmental impacts of different activities carried out on earth. Nowadays, the causes of environmental problems are the increasing population and the greater consumption of natural resources.

Another cause is pollution, which includes air, land, water, marine and noise. Pollution is defined as the introduction of harmful contaminants that are outside the norm for a given ecosystem. These various types of pollutions are discussed in this research. In addition, radiation, natural calamities and drugs, narcotics and food additives are also included. Environmental engineering plays extremely important role because cleaner and healthier environment means healthier life with more quality.

Unhealthy environment leads to diseases, deaths, and generally low quality of life. Science and engineering really have tough task ahead of them to keep our environment clean and healthy in years to come because ecological problems are constantly growing, and what is even worse, they are all connected so loving one doesn't count a lot on global scale. Take for instance problem of air and water pollution in Asia, water supply in Africa and you'll see only few challenges that environmental engineering needs to overcome in years to come.

The Ecosystem An ecosystem is a community of organisms interacting with each other and with their environment such that energy is exchanged and system-level processes, such as the cycling of elements emerge. The ecosystem is a core concept in Biology and Ecology, serving as the level of biological organization in which organisms interact simultaneously with each other and with their environment. As such, ecosystems are a level above that of the ecological community (organisms of different species interacting with each other) but are at a level below, or equal to, biomass and the biosphere.

Essentially, biomass are regional ecosystems, and the biosphere is the largest of all possible ecosystems. Ecosystems include living organisms, the dead organic matter produced by them, the biotic environment within which the organisms live and exchange elements (soils, water, atmosphere), and the interactions between these components. Ecosystems embody the concept that living organisms continually interact with each other and with the environment to produce complex systems with emergent properties, such that "the whole is greater than the sum of its parts" and "everything is connected".

In recent years, the impact of humans has caused a number of dramati
