Abstract

Diabetic foot infections (DFIs) are serious long-term consequences of diabetes, and they provide a diagnostic difficulty since it is exceedingly challenging to distinguish between osteomyelitis (OM), soft tissue infection (STI), and Charcot's osteoarthropathy. However, in order to design the patient's best course of therapy, such a differential diagnosis is essential. However, it would be ideal to have a non-invasive test that is capable of detecting, localising, and assessing the degree of the infection with high accuracy. Currently, the gold standard for diagnosis is the isolation of the pathogen from bone or soft tissues. The best way to treat diabetic patients with infectious problems is through a multidisciplinary approach, although there are currently no definitive diagnostic flow charts available. This review intends to give a general overview of multimodal imaging for the diagnosis of DFI and to provide clinicians with evidence-based responses when they request that radiologists or nuclear medicine (NM) doctors examine their patients.

Introduction

A prevalent consequence of long-term diabetes is diabetic foot infection (DFI), which is linked to significant morbidity, an elevated risk of lower limb amputation, and a high death rate [1]. The development of DFI originates from a complicated interplay involving peripheral neuropathy, peripheral arterial disease (PAD), and the immune system. The main risk factor for diabetic foot ulcerations is neuropathy (DFU). Foot abnormalities brought on by damaged motor neurons lead to harm to the foot's tissues and bones. Sensory neurons injury leads to a lack of protective feeling. As a result, individuals with neuropathic conditions may get skin ulcers that go unnoticed for a long time, exposing the nearby soft tissues to the colonisation of bacteria and leading to a soft tissue infection (STI). The infection may spread to the underlying bone and result in osteomyelitis (OM) if it is not immediately found and treated. Since inadequate tissue oxygenation may hinder ulcer healing, PAD further promotes microbial invasion and the quick development to infection by providing the ideal environment for pathogen colonisation.
