

In the French language, the word for the Aurora Borealis is "Northern Lights" which translates as "les lueurs". The name originates from an ancient French myth in which the lights were created by a fight of two competing deities across the ether, scattering fire into the sky.

These lights provide an excellent opportunity for observing the aurora borealis, as the persistent darkness allows us the possibility of witnessing the light at any time of day. The aurora appear also make excellent subjects for studying the aurora. The aurora are best viewed at longitudes for the High Northern Hemisphere, compared to the world's southernmost areas.

Finally, aurora in the winter season, aurora are naturally viewed in one of their coldest to get a look at the correct conditions of the night sky and, with some luck, the northern lights.

These otherworldly lights are undeniably one of the main reasons why I adore polar night so much. They enhance the already magical experience of the winter world!

What Are the Northern Lights?

The northern lights occur when charged particles electrons and protons collide with gases in Earth's upper atmosphere. These collisions produce ion flashes, filling the sky with colorful light. As billions of these flashes occur in quick intervals, the aurora seem to be dancing across the night sky. In essence, the aurora occur when an interaction between Earth's magnetic field and solar wind takes place.

These otherworldly lights are undeniably one of the main reasons why I adore polar night so much.
