

Repairing Fiberglass Boats

In spite of some claims to the contrary, fiberglass boats can be damaged. Fortunately, damage to fiberglass itself is fairly easy to repair. Not all damage to fiberglass boats is in the fiberglass part of the boats, however. Wood and metal parts can be damaged as well. Repair or replacement of broken or damaged wood and metal usually involves familiar methods.

This chapter describes how to repair fiberglass itself. Many do-it-yourselfers who feel quite comfortable making complicated repairs to wood or metal are often hesitant to attempt repairs to fiberglass. This is often because the methods and techniques for making the fiberglass repairs are less familiar, not because they are any more difficult. Once the techniques are understood, repairs to fiberglass are often much easier to make.

Before undertaking fiberglassing repair work, you should first know the fundamentals of fiberglassing (see Chapter 10). You should also follow the health and safety rules and procedures for working with fiberglassing chemicals and materials.

WORKING CONDITIONS

When you make repairs to fiberglass laminates, the repair should be as strong or stronger than the original. This must be done under working conditions that are not as ideal as those under which the boat was originally constructed at the factory.

Ideally, fiberglass boat repair work should be done under laboratory conditions with factors such as temperature and humidity carefully controlled. For most of your own fiberglassing repair work, you will probably have to work under much less satisfactory conditions. Some repairs can be made with the boat in the water; others require that the boat be hauled out. Regardless, always strive for the best conditions possible, especially for crucial jobs such as fiberglass hull repairs.

A temperature of about 75 degrees Fahrenheit with low humidity works best when laying up laminates with polyester resin. By varying the amounts of catalyst used, however, satisfactory repair work can be done in a temperature range from about 60 degrees to 90 degrees Fahrenheit, though try to avoid the extremes as much as possible. For the most crucial work, the temperature should be as close to the 75-degree Fahrenheit mark as possible. By using special low-temperature polyester resins, repair work is possible at temperatures even below 60 degrees Fahrenheit. Whenever possible, avoid fiberglassing in direct sunlight. Rig up some type of sun shade or awning over the work area if necessary.

While the techniques in the practice fiberglassing exercises in Chapter 10 are basically the same as those used for major repairs, there are some important differences. First, the practice exercises used small, 6-inch square areas of reinforcing material. Fiberglassing repairs often involve much larger areas that might require somewhat different techniques.

Second, the practice exercises were done on a level plane. This often isn't practical when making actual repairs. Fiberglassing is often done on inclined, vertical, and even overhead surfaces. You will have problems with resin dripping, running, and pooling, and with reinforcing material sagging and bunching up. In some cases, high-viscosity resins or regular viscosity polyester resin with a thixotropic agent added can alleviate some of these problems.

And third, actual repair work might have to be done under less sanitary conditions than were the practice exercises. Dust, dirt, and grime can mix in with fiberglassing materials and chemicals and greatly reduce the quality of the resulting laminates. Still, you will want to do your fiberglassing repair work under the cleanest possible conditions. Always clean up the work area as much as possible before starting fiberglassing.

Fiberglass boats can be damaged by wear, abrasion, impact, sun exposure, and other ways. The resulting damage can range from minor to major. Some of the most costly cosmetic damage to
