 Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Observation and self-reflection is an integral part of any developmental process. The following paper contains an analysis of the comments gathered during the fieldwork practice and an overview of achievements and shortcomings pertinent to the social work experience.

Supervision and Consultation Use Evaluation

During my field education, my field instructor provided the necessary support, consultation, supervision, and oversight required for my development. In this regard, I can say with certainty that my relationship with the field instructor concerned the knowledge acquisition and transmission domain primarily, but was not limited to this area. Speaking of the knowledge acquisition, my field instructor provided me with the necessary feedback and guided my inquiries in the unfamiliar places as well as those I had weaknesses in. In this context, the relationship with the instructor resembles the teacher-student model, although these characterize a relatively small proportion of interaction. Much more often, the connections are built around the feedback received after the supervision of either a specific activity or a range of practices.

In this regard, they can be described as promoting my developmental effort and contributing to my mastery of the competencies necessary for a foster care department worker. In other words, this area of relationships actualizes my existing knowledge pertinent to the field and empowers me to develop them in the right direction. I can say that this element of connections is essential for my competencies development since, among other effects, it allows me to identify the most feasible learning opportunities and, by extension, maximize my potential as a student. I would also like to point out the importance of communicating the values and ethics of social work experience and apply them to the practical dimension of my fieldwork. While not being a primary responsibility of the instructor, it still has a visible impact on bridging the gap between theory and practice, which was of particular use to me in the initial stages of the way.

The latter element of the supervisor-supervisee relationship is among the few that differentiate it from the teacher-pupil model. Generally speaking, the primary responsibilities and roles of a field instructor, such as guidance, support, and evaluation,
