VIEWPOINT

As the industry continues to evolve, the need for a more integrated approach to project management is becoming increasingly apparent. The traditional siloed structure of many organizations is being challenged by the need for cross-functional collaboration and communication. This is particularly true in the construction industry, where the complexity of projects and the need for real-time data and decision-making are paramount. The industry is looking for solutions that can bridge the gap between different departments and provide a unified view of the project. This is where the concept of a "single source of truth" comes in. By having a central repository of data, all stakeholders can access the same information, reducing the risk of miscommunication and ensuring that everyone is working from the same page. This is a key component of a more integrated project management approach.
