purchased and whose life's blood he had acquired the power of shedding at pleasure for the sum of a thousand dollars. The former waiting maid, now the mother of several children, was purchased by our present master for four hundred dollars at the sheriff's sale, and this poor wretch, whose employment in early life had been to take care of her young mistress and attend to her in her chamber and at her toilet, after being torn from her husband and her children, had now gone to toil out a horrible existence beneath the scorching sun of a South Carolina cotton field, under the dominion of a master as void of the manners of a gentleman as he was of the language of humanity. Cotton, he said, had not been higher for many years, and as a great many persons, especially young men, were moving off to the new purchase in Georgia, prime hands were in high demand for the purpose of clearing the land in the new country, that the boys and girls under twenty would bring almost any price at present in Columbia for the purpose of picking the growing crop of cotton. Pg 46 which promised to be very heavy, and as most persons had planted more than their hands would be able to pick, young niggers, who would soon learn to pick cotton, were prime articles in the market.

Charles Ball, 2017-03-17. In 1805 he was sold to a South Carolinian cotton planter, thus estranged from his wife and children who remained in Maryland. After several escapes and recaptures, he wrote his autobiography with the help of the white lawyer Isaac Fisher. Charles Ball was eventually married and had children, and in 1805 he was sold to a Georgia trader without warning and was once again separated from his family. He eventually escaped from slavery and settled in Pennsylvania where he wrote his memoir. Ball's history memoir is a fascinating, realistic account of the life of slaves and slave owners in the early 19th century, which he describes as one long, waste-barren desert of cheerless, hopeless, lifeless slavery to be varied only by the pangs of hunger and the stings of the lash. Recalling the brutal conditions in slave life, he describes the heartache of having family members sold away, as his mother and father were, and as he was separated from his wife and children, taken south, chained to a line of other slaves. In one long account, Ball relates the story of a fellow slave who had been captured in Africa, and we learn of the horrific conditions on slave ships bound for the West. On this slave's journey, he recounts that 1/3 of the slaves on the ship died during the passage to Charleston, South Carolina. Ball also provides detailed accounts of the environments he lived in in the U.S., including the wide destruction of the arable land created by the over-planting of tobacco, and descriptions of other flora and fauna of the southern states, the terrible diet of slave life, with each given only a peck of dry corn each week, supplemented at times with a dried fish or bite of meat, the toil of slave life, with work from dawn to dusk, much of the year, and with many slaves working with absolutely no clothes on their backs, of the differences between the lives of slaves and slave owners in the northern states of Maryland and Delaware, through the uplands and tidewater districts of Virginia and into the deep south and the Carolinas which he regarded with the greatest dread suicide among slaves which he claims was more common than is generally known What is life worth amidst hunger nakedness and excessive toil Ball writes under the continuously uplifted lash and how some slave owners and their family members were in fact kind and accommodating with slaves while others in fact mostly slave overseers one who Ball describes as a tiger in human form 54 were brutal and cruel wielding whips and other weapons Ball also holds forth about the development of the cotton gin and how that invention affected slavery Ball also served the United States in the War of 1812 By 1813 he had enlisted in Commodore Joshua Barney s Chesapeake Bay Flotilla and fought at the Battle of Bladensburg on August 24 1814 An excerpt from his account of the battle which was a resounding defeat for the Americans I stood at my gun until the Commodore was shot down when he ordered us to retreat as I was told by the officer who commanded our gun If the militia regiments that lay upon our right and left could have been brought to charge the British in close fight as they crossed the bridge we should have killed or taken the whole of them in a short time but the militia ran like sheep chased by dogs purchased by a trader from Georgia I now saw the extent of my misfortune but could not learn who the persons were who had seized me In the evening however one of the gentlemen who had brought me from home came into the jail with the jailer and asked me if I knew him On being answered in the negative he told me that he knew me very well and asked me

From Slavery to Agrarian Capitalism in the Cotton Plantation South Joseph P.
