

Feature Writing

What is a feature story?

Feature stories

- are sometimes called “human interest” stories.
- explore their topics in greater depth than news stories.
- use facts that are likely to amuse or entertain the reader.
- place an emphasis on details, anecdotes, quotations, and descriptions.
- must be factual and original; they are not a form of fiction.
- must be objective; they are not essays or editorials.
- are usually published by magazines and newspapers.

Types of features

- Profiles or personality features describe interesting people. To be effective, profiles must do more than list an individual’s achievements; they must reveal the person’s character.
- Historical features commemorate important events, describe landmarks, discuss changes in the community, and so on. These features can be tied to items in the news. For example, during an election year, a feature might be written about past elections.
- Adventure features describe unusual and exciting experiences. In this type of feature story, quotations and descriptions are especially important.
- Seasonal features highlight seasons and holidays. These feature stories are sometimes difficult to write because the writer must come up with a new angle.
- Explanatory features provide a more detailed description of topics in the news. For example, after a bank robbery, a feature might be written about bank safes.
- How-to-do-it features tell readers how to perform a task—buy a house, find a job, plant a garden, and so on.

(Fodler, 1989, pp. 619-624)

Tips for Writing the Feature

The Title

Features usually have a main title that gives the reader an idea about the subject and a subtitle that specifies the information in the title. Example: “Headed South: Hundreds of Local Volunteers Leave for Florida to Help Rebuild Homes and Lives.” In this case, the subtitle eliminates confusion by explaining to the reader that this feature is not about migrating birds.

- The main title should be concise (generally six words or fewer).
- The main title might reflect the content and tone of the article, but it does not necessarily have to do this. If it does not, then it is imperative that the subtitle does.
- The title/subtitle should be eye catching and appealing to readers and should compel them to investigate the article itself.

(G. Himebaugh, JOUR 3530 lecture, February 12, 2003)

The Lead

It is always best to begin a feature with a lead that captures your readers’ attention.
