

Types of mental health medications

Mental health exists on a continuum, with mental health and mental illness at the two extreme ends.

According to NHS England, one in four adults experiences issues with their mental health in any given year.¹

The main categories of medicines used for mental health conditions are:

Antidepressants

Primarily prescribed for depression, but also sometimes helpful for other conditions including anxiety, obsessive compulsive disorder, and pain, antidepressants are used to improve mood and quality of life, and to reduce the risk of relapse or recurrence.²

Stimulant medications

Stimulant medications are typically prescribed to treat ADHD, and they work by increasing alertness, attention and energy levels.⁴

Anti-anxiety medications or anxiolytics

Research by the Mental Health Foundation in 2023 showed that nearly 60% of UK adults surveyed reported anxiety that interfered in their daily lives during the previous two weeks.³

Antipsychotics

Antipsychotics, also known as neuroleptics, are mainly used to treat disorders such as schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, and psychotic depression.⁴

Antimanic drugs

Antimanic drugs (or mood stabilisers) are typically used to treat bipolar disorder to manage acute episodes of mania or hypomania and to prevent recurrence.⁴

Smoking cessation drugs

As we know, people with a mental health condition are more likely to smoke and as a result, have a much lower life expectancy. Encouraging patients with mental illness to quit smoking benefits their overall health outcomes.⁵
